DECISION

An application was filed before the Second Labour Court, Ahmedabad, by 12 line jobbers of the appellant mill under section 78(1)(A)(c) of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act alleging that there had been an illegal change on the part of the concern in that the practice of paying efficiency bonus had been discontinued from July 1950. The Labour Court held that the company's action in withholding the practice of efficiency bonus amounted to an illegal change and directed that it should be withdrawn and that the applicants should be paid efficiency bonus as from 1st February, 1951. On appeal the Industrial Court, Bombay, confirmed that order subject to some slight modification of the wording of the Labour Court's decision. In effect the Industrial Court preserved the old practice and directed that the illegal change should be withdrawn and that the applicants should be paid efficiency bonus which became payable from 1st February 1951. Against that decision the employers have filed the present appeal.

2. It is necessary to appreciate the nature of this scheme of efficiency bonus. It would appear that prior to October 1947, the production in this mill was below the standard which could be expected. Wages had been standardized and it was just a case of low production. The company, therefore decided to give the line jobbers an incentive so that they might secure better production from the weavers. The line jobbers themselves were interested in better production as their individual salaries were 10 per cent. of the total salaries of the weavers under them. According to their application the employees concerned called this incentive given to the line jobbers as "inam (a sort of production bonus)" payable if the efficiency of their respective lines exceeded 80 per cent. In the evidence before the Labour Court the second applicant stated that from about 1948 the line jobbers were given prizes for giving good production and those prizes were over and above the wages fixed in the standardization award. The rate of a prize according to him was Rs. 5 per every additional percentage above 80 per cent. but he was obliged to admit that there was no fixed standard by which the prizes were decided as damage in the weaving was also taken into account, and the rate which he had mentioned was not adopted every time by the mill. In fact in 1949 one of the line jobbers was given a cycle as a prize on account of his efficiency for the whole year. This witness admits that the average efficiency before the system of prizes was started was 76 per cent. or 77 per cent., and the efficiency had risen to 85 per cent. by June 1950. It is not in dispute that the method of ascertaining the amount of the incentive so paid was never communicated to the employees, and the evidence indicates that the system, if it can be regarded as a system, was nothing more than a scheme of gratuity at the will and discretion of the management. According to the company at the end of a month the General Manager would fix the prizes. He would take into account the production of the month, and would himself decide what should be regarded as the norm of production for the month, and he would give to the line jobbers "prizes" according to the extent to which production in that department exceeded the norm. There was no fixed system for ascertaining either the norm or the prizes to be given to the individual line jobbers; it was a matter entirely at the discretion of the General Manager. It is true that the workmen have endeavoured to deduce the mental process of the General Manager in fixing the 'prize' from the charts of the various months in which prizes were given, but there was no uniformity or consistency about it, and it would appear that the General Manager took into account a variety of circumstances: the very fact that he of himself decided the percentage of efficiency for the month from all the available factors negatives the idea of any fixed scheme or rule. Even after such percentages had been fixed, what followed was not constant. The Courts below were therefore in error in regarding this payment as a usage or practice. Confronted with this difficulty the representative of the workmen before us urged that it was a reward within the definition of wages as appearing in section 3 (39) of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act and be contended that his case fell within Schedule II item 7 or 9.

3. On behalf of the employers it has been urged that the application was barred by limitation. The payment of such incentive to the line jobbers ceased from the end of July 1950 by which date 85 per cent. of efficiency was reached which was considered to be reasonable. No complaint was made by the line jobbers until the 26th April 1951 when this complaint was filed by 9 jobbers of one of the three shifts. The workmen no doubt realised the difficulty of their position as to limitation, and, therefore, stated in their application that the system had been discontinued from February 1951; this statement is obviously untrue. It was contended that the non-payment of this incentive was a recurring cause of action at the end of every month and therefore there was no bar of limitation except as to the retrospective effect which could be given. It cannot, however, be deputed that the scheme was ended after the payment for June 1950 and the line jobbers became aware of it from that date. There is therefore no question of recurring cause of action when the whole scheme had been terminated. We therefore find that the application was barred by limitation, and it is not suggested that we should condon the delay.

4. In our view no question of illegal change arose. A change means a departure from something constant and well ascertained; and the 'prize' or 'inam' given does not partake of this character, for it is dependent on no fixed principle or routine but varies according to the will of the management from month to month. A reward for labour, in order to become the subject of an illegal change, must be based on some ascertainable basis of computation which is not the case here. In our view the application was incompetent.

5. The decision appealed from is set aside and the application is dismissed.
